Forth Replacement Crossing

The Queensferry Crossing's three concrete towers have reached their maximum height, 207m above high tide, and are now the UK's tallest bridge structures. The next critical stage of lifting the 110 deck segments into place, and installing the stay cables which hold them up, began in autumn 2015 and is progressing well. For more info:

I will be a fully-qualified drone pilot (once it stops raining) with the legal requirement of a Permission for Aerial Work (PFAW) and cannot wait to start photography and video from a bird's eye view. (More about drone photography later in the newsletter).

I wish everyone a very happy, healthy and prosperous 2016. My year began with a scary big Birthday, but made sweeter by awesome family and friends, and a cake from Hot Chocolates! After an attempt to defy the ageing process I now feel 100.

Demolition at night

Off with the high heels and on with the work boots for some photography at 2am on a Sunday morning! (Demolition of the B800 bridge over the A90 outside South Queensferry - part of the roadworks to connect the Queensferry Crossing to the existing roads network).

Getty images

I spend spare work time submitting images and news stories to stock libraries Getty, Photoshot and Barcroft Media. There's no point having zillions of images in hard drives when they could be enjoyed by others and bring in cash. More of my grey seal and wildflower images can be viewed:

When night fell at Botanic Lights 2015 - Seasons in Colour - photographers daltied along a mesmerising trail of light, which used fire and lasers to highlight the trees and water.

Tour of Britain 2015

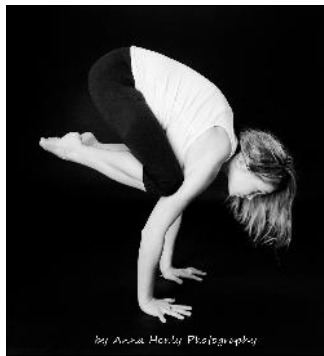

I went to Kelso to photograph the Tour and found myself running down the the road AFTER the cyclists, dodging a jam of honking team cars. I was thinking my recent "Outdoor Emergency First Aid" qualification from the British Association of Ski Patrollers might prove useful. The casualty was Petr Vakoc, weeping because he would surely lose the yellow jersey.
